EVOLUTION AND NATIONAL STRENGTH.

Thomas Carlyle was not a philosopher much iterested in the theory of Evolution; but once, inadvertently, he stated the theory, and a criticism of it; in a single graphic sentance. The welter of civilized life, he said, was like a canister full of worms each of which was wriggling towards the surface. It is rather a pity that Mr. Huzley did not recall that remark when he was composing he Romanes lecture which he delivered at Oxford. It might have given him a one towards a practical deduction from the facts and fancies which bis highly interesting discourse colleted. Are the worms which get to the top of society in the cenister necessarily the fittest to be there? Surely one cannot say so. They get to the top as much by reason of the wriggling of the other vorms as by dint of their own exertions. To call them the fittest or the strongest, to apply to them the superlative of any adjective what-scever, would be absurd. The real question—from the answer to which some guidance may be got-is, what are the results of their being there? and what willhappen if they are displaced? The results of the survival of certain classes and nations have been stability, orderly progress, evolution in the same of growth in Individual, in communal, and in national strength, It was the old theory of English statesmen that growth could only be obtained by giving individuals scope for the exercise of the gifts with which they have been endowed. Within the last few years, however, a curious change has orept over our ideas. "Fragile read as he may be, man, as Pascal said," Mr. Hurley echoing, " is a thinking reed. There lies within him a fund of energy, operating intelligently, and so far akin to that which pervades the universe that it is competant to influence and modify the cosmis process.' struggle which might be conducted on principles more advantageous to the weak in muscle and to the weak in brain. The passion of pity, one of the Istent energies to which Pascal and Mr. Huxley allude, has stepped in to change the show of things. The weak men pity themselves; and the strong men are moved to their inmost bowels of compassion when they think of the poor or the destitute in the abstract. The weak want pity and help, and society at large is disposed to feel that the want should be acceded to. That, like the accidentally exalted worms, and like the ruling classes in our social life, is a fact which lence of it, and evidence of it almost exclusively. The later Poryism -the Toryism of Lord Randolph Churchill and Sir John Gorst, for example -corroborates the Statute Books, and shows that the passion of pity is not a passion of the masses slone. It is the passion of the age.

What will it produce? What is to happen if the unaided instinct for mere comfort supplents, as the power moulding the constitution of society and of nations, the instinct of competition and the willingness to appent the results? That is a very large question. The difficulties which make other problems arising out of the theory of evolution impossible to solve surround it not in single spies but in battalions. Evolution itsaf, as Mr. Huxley admits, is cyclical. Who knows what the next cycle may produce? Civiination tends to san the elemental energies of the natural man's and if the expring went on Europe and the United States would succumb before the barbarians, the conditions of whose life conduce to brute force and to fecundity. As Mr. Huxley says, however, "the more we learn of the nature of things the more is it evident that what is called rest is only unperceived notivity." It is more than possible, that under the surface of civilization there are resources sufficient to stem the flood of savagedom with which Mr. Pearson threatens us. A great war in Europe or in America would speedily show that the white man's liking for a fight, and his power to fight with effect are far from bying exhausted. The passion of pity would evaporate; and the cycle Socialism, which seems to be spreading over Europe, would be over. This is the sure hops, though the last resort, of the German Emperor, of the Czar, and of other rulers under less urgency. As for each civilized State in itself, in it too with its own epitome of the universal struggle, the struggle of the many who are weak against the few who are strong, there may be a saving grade. Every come of nature as anything else. St. James's

Mr. G. A. Sale has given us an extremely inforesting personal reminiscence in the Daily Telegraph. During his teens, Mr. Sala "had been sent to Paris to be educated in a great public school; and when (he writes), at the expiration of two years, I returned to my native enuntry, I was sent to a Pestalezzian school at Turnham Green to learn English, a language which I am still attentively studying, but in which I fear that I have made but scant progress during the last fifty years or so. Leaving school, it appeared to my parent, my friends, and to some extent to myself that ought to follow the profession of an artist say to some extent; times, although I was passionately fond of drawing and had had a thorough grounding in practical geometry in France, I was painfully aware of one fact, which seemed to have been overlooked by the Coaking mother and kindred who so cordially lanks admired the pen-and-ink drawings, principally caricatures, which I was continually scrawling. The fact in question was that I had been blind in childhood, and that, although I recovered my night under homeopathic treatment, I only got back one completely valid eye. The other was and still remains a duffer, wandering about on its own secount, and persistently refusing to do any tangible work, that is to say, to distinguish anything in the field of vision beyond the light of a very bright damp or oundle, or a large sheat of blank paper; the Chinese Loan 86 B. rest being mainly chaptic fog. One would have thought that the literary tressures of the United Kingdom had long ago been rabadated for the purposes of extracting history; but old manuscripts turn up in the most wonderful way, like old masters, from the most strange places, and, occasionally, throw floods of light on the dark spots of Buglish history. Dr. Jessop, in one of his countries in the Ninetsouth Century, tell un that, of the 19 years of the reign of Stephen; less inknown than of any other period, and no period is so barren of contemporary records. About two years ago; however, a listingnished scholar, Mr Montagne James, went down to the little out of the way willage of Brent Fleigh in Suffolk, hearing of alibrary, in which he faintly boped he might make some find; and he was emply rewarded, for he discovered a folio volume, Miningbound in its original boards, containing the legend of St. William, written by Thomas of Monmouth-a book which is often alluded to in medieval writings, but which had never yet been found. With it were six others of the same period, vis., the twelth contury, and alliof them are now sife in the Cambridge University Library. It seems that in the beginning of the eighteenth century some one bequeathed a library to the parish : but no one had ever come to the place who could read or even take an interest in it, for two hundred years. CATABBE, HAY FEVER, CATABREAU DEAF-NESS .- A NEW HOME TREATMENT. - Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the living membrane of the pose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distraning diseases are rapidly and permanently by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphle explaining this new treatment is sent on recoipt
